

Currently, I earn around €800 to €1,000 per month on average. I also have about €2,000 in my bank account for now, until I find a stable job with a suitable income.

I can also save another €1,000 next month. I would like to buy a mobile phone within the next two to three weeks, with a maximum budget of €900 to €1,000, not more. So I need to manage my savings in a way that allows me to make this purchase.

The good thing is that I can buy it from websites that allow payment in four installments, which is very helpful for me. This means that a large amount of money will not leave my account all at once, and I can comfortably pay the four installments.

Apart from that, most of my purchases these days, especially over the past few months, have only been household necessities: things I really need, such as food and clothing, only when necessary.

I am also planning to take a short trip, but I already bought the ticket in advance, and the whole trip will probably cost me only around €50 or €60.

In addition, I can take on some freelance work and do it alongside my current situation, and I think the income from that could be relatively good.